"BRITISH POLITICAL OUT-LOOK."

It is reported that an election is shortly to take place, and that Gladstone expects to be out of office in a day or two. It seems certain that the Government will be defeated on the Egyptian Policy, and active preparations are being made throughout the country for an election. Public opinion is bitterly against the arrangement with France, because the British believe it was secured by concessions degrading to the prestige of Britain, being another example of Gladstone's "peace at any price policy." Mr. Waddington, French Ambassador to London, deplores the hostile attitude of the British press, and believes it will raise a feeling of unfriendliness between the two people, as the French are equally opposed to the arrangement, asserting that France did not obtain enough as the price of her alliance. Mr. Gladstone personally wired his supporters in Commons at return at once, so the seriousness of the situation may be judged. The rebels after forcing their way into Berberon on May 23rd, massacred 1,500 men of the garrison and 2,000 of the male population. The Pall Mall Gazette says: "We must now add 3,500 more to the 12,000 already butchered to make a holiday for Gladstonian principals. Humanity revolts at such a state of things. Some how or other a stop should be put to it." The tone of the liberal press has been against this extraordinary villification, and complete want of purpose in this Egyptian chaos that the Government has got into. Mr. Gladstone's greatest friends are afraid of him. Mr. Forster lately spoke pretty plainly on the want of decision on the part of the "grand old man." Lord Rosebery declares that the justification for British interference in Egypt is the impossibility of affording, "to let France or any other foreign power have dominion in a country through which lies the road to that India, of which we are so justly proud," or, still more important in his estimation, "to the great southern colonies of this country." Rosebery is so tied to Gladstone, and is, in fact, not honest enough to condemn this temporary occupation of Egypt. In the whole affair Gladstone has juggled. Take for example in quoting in the Commons, a portion of Gordon's telegram which ran: "Scarcely a day passes without our inflicting losses on the rebels," but did not finish the telegram in the honest way the "G. O. M.'s" worshippers gave him so much credit for, as it ended "but those losses are quite unnecessary, if we are eventually to succumb." This may be called diplomacy, or politics, but it is not creditable to a British Premier. It is to be seen if an appeal to the country will support a policy which has brought so much bloodshed, waste of money, and loss of prestige with the European Powers.

INDEPENDENCE.

There are doubtless many Englishmen who believe with John Bright and Mr. Gladstone that whenever Canada asks for her independence it should be accorded her. John Bright's remarks on the subject of Canadian independence 20 years ago are being recalled, now that the question is up again for discussion. The upshot of what he said was that if Canada, by a friendly separation from the mother country, became an independent state, choosing its own form of government, it would not be less friendly to Europe and its tariff would not be more adverse to English manufacturers than it is now. Since that time the National Policy has been adopted. Sir Francis Hincks says that no country ever changed its allegiance without bloodshed. He argues that if Canada were to become independent it would have to be through the shedding of blood. In that case Canada had better remain as she is. But there is not the shadow of ground for fearing such a thing. England is the fruitful mother of nations, and could well afford to offer Canada her independence. Her representative men have already done this, but Canada hesitates to accept it. We may all rest assured that the change will be effected without the shedding of a single drop of gore.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The American papers are out in favor of the remodelling of the extradition treaty between Great Britain and their country, the Lord affair at Quebec prompting them to take this position. There is no reason in the world why the extradition treaty between the two countries should not be much wider and more effective. It is no benefit to one country to be a refuge for the criminals of the other.

The royal families of Europe, now mostly German, are building up a family compact that will provide serious trouble some day. A recent report is that the king of Holland has secretly affianced his three year old daughter to Prince Baudouin, son of the count of Flanders, and heir apparent to the crown of Belgium. This looks like preparing for the reunion of Holland and Belgium which were separated about fifty years ago. All Europe will now be anxious to hear what Bismarck has to say on the subject.

The advantage of there being a president in the White House who will not be friendly to England is apparent. Blaine is not particularly friendly to England, and if the opportunity arises he may be depended upon to stir up a mild breeze against the British lion. The dynamic faction have had matters pretty much their own way in the States, and few real efforts have been made to suppress their mischievous movements against England. No doubt the election of Blaine would give great encouragement to the dynamic faction, and it would look to him to wink at its efforts on behalf of the Irish cause.

It seems that the Grand Duke of Hesse has arranged matters satisfactorily with his Russian countess and that she will trouble him no more. The obstacle to the Grand Duke's marriage with the Princess Beatrice having been removed, all that now remains is for the House of Lords to pass the bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and then the princess can marry her brother-in-law, and the Queen can present her with the diamond necklace, valued at forty thousand pounds, or about two hundred thousand dollars in our money, which it was intimated a short time ago her Majesty had bought for the prospective bride.

The Orangemen and Nationalists seem to be having a lively time in Ulster. Ulster is the Protestant part of Ireland, and on former occasions the Orangemen were able to keep the Nationalists at a distance, and thus prevent them from sowing the seeds of sedition in the north. But the Nationalists appear to have prevailed upon the Government to come to their assistance, as they are now holding their meetings in spite of all the opposition the Orangemen have been able to offer. The Government, having soldiers and police on the spot, is able to keep the rival factions apart, but how would it be if Ireland were independent and the rival factions were not restrained by an intervening power? The chances are that they would eat each other up, and that in a short time, for her own peace and safety, England would be compelled to reconquer the country. It seems hard that the Orangemen, who are at any rate loyal to the Crown, should be prohibited from holding counter meetings to those held by the Nationalists, at which the seed of sedition and discontent is so liberally sown. There is a good deal of inflammable material in Ireland just now and a few sparks would set the Island on fire.
